The Way Girls In the Big Departs ment Stores Are Watched.

The girls in a large department store, says Frank Leslie's, are, as a rule, carefully watched not only in the store, but out of it. The buyer of each department knows pretty well the habits of his sales ladies; knows how much ! costs them to live and how they spend their evenings. It is easy for him to get the information not merely through the store detective, but in many other

The buyer is, as a rule, a tolerant person, who cares only for two thingsnamely, that the girls "deliver the goods"-i. e., that they make big "books"-and that they appear respectable. If they stay out so late at night that they do not reach the store promptly in the morning they may be discharged, transferred from one department to another or merely not rise in the way of salary, depending on the degree of their misdemeanor. If the girl's book is unsatisfactory she is simply discharged or transferred, and no reason is given, but if she is wise she knows the reason why.

If, on the other hand, the girl is a good seller the buyer will excuse a great deal in the way of irregularity of habits. As long as a giff sticks closely to business she is allowed a great deal of freedom, but when her "book" begins to suffer it is time for her to "look

A Lawyer's Bill.

Here is the story of an Ohio lawyer who did not become a politician, as he was not built on political lines. It is told by a Washington man, who was his clerk at one time. Lawyer B. was a gruff sort of personage and believed in making every one pay for every service. One of his clients was the president of a bank, who, during the pendency of his case, dropped into the lawyer's office very frequently and told stories. The lawyer was a good listener, and seemed to enjoy the stories very much, but after the banker went out Lawyer B. would say: Here, charge Mr. - $10 for an hour of my time. If I have got to listen to his stories he has got to pay me for it." Finally, the bill was made out and carried to the banker. It was an itemized account, stating the date of each call. He scanned it closely and remarked: "He has made me pay for it pretty well, hasn't he?"

"Pay for what?" asked the clerk. "For listening to my stories." And then he paid the bill.-Washing ton Post.

Change of Schedule.

The base-ball game announced to be played this afternoon between the Watsessing and Milburn clubs has been cancelled and in its stead the Watsessing will play the Orange A. C. on the Grove street oval, East Orange.
